Wreck of Whaler Kathleen RECALLS INCIDENT Of Hawaii's Whaling Days

Dispatches received in the last other boats, as he came up with them, to cut loose from their whales, as the Kathleen had sunk.

"I was the last one to be told," said Reynolds, in telling his experience. "I was the furthest away, and it was about dark when the Kathleen was struck. The first thing I knew I saw a boat coming up under full sail. A half came from the boat:

"Are you fast?"
"Yes," I replied.
"Cut loose. The Kathleen has been sunk," said Captain Jenkins.
"We got all our boats together and distributed the crew so as to get ten men into each boat. The captain then said:

"We will keep together during the night, and in the morning we'll spread out and watch for help."
"I said, 'We have no water and no provisions.'"
"I'll give you provisions and water," replied the captain. "Come alongside."
"He divided up, putting about fifteen pounds of bread and four and a half gallons of water in each boat. This was our allowance to go 800 miles.

"When daylight came there was no sail in sight. The boats had become separated. I took a can and started to drink some of the water. It was salt. A breeze had sprung up in the night and blown some salt spray into the bucket. I got out my compass and said to the other men, 'Well, boys, I guess it's up to us to see what we can do toward getting to land. The sail was raised, and I set the course west by north for the Barbados, 950 miles away. In the course of half an hour I sighted a sail ahead. The boat hove to and waited for us. It was the captain's boat. As we came up the captain shouted, 'Have you seen the other boats?'
"No," I called back. "I haven't got any water!"
"The captain again divided. About 9 o'clock that morning Captain Jenkins sighted smoke on the horizon and steered toward it. I saw him leaving his course and concluded he saw something that looked like rescue, so I followed suit. It proved to be the steamer Borderer, bound from Baltimore for a Chilean port, with coal. The people on the Borderer sighted us and stood down toward us. I heard afterward it was the chief engineer who discovered us. He had just come on deck and saw us over the starboard bow. 'There's a sail,' he said to the officer of the deck. 'Probably a fishing boat.'"

"Sighting of the Boats."
"What's a fishing boat doing out here, 900 miles from land? It's a slippery hole in her as if he had been the ram of a gunboat. The bark began to fill immediately. The whale disappeared beneath the waves, and was seen no more."
Nichols observed what had occurred to the Kathleen, got out the oars and made for her. She was already carrying. Captain Jenkins and the others on board had got together some bread and water by the time the whale boat came alongside, and these were put in. Mrs. Jenkins was anxious to save her parrot, which was a good talker, and the bird was hunting up and taken aboard last. It was said by a member of the crew that the parrot uttered something like, "I'll be — I'll ever go a-whaling again!" as he was put into the boat.

"Sinks in Half an Hour."
Leaving the Kathleen, which sank inside of thirty minutes after she was rammed, Captain Jenkins ordered the Thinking that the captain's boat had nearly full sail set, because it was ahead, De Veira shook out his sail, and when morning came no boat was to be seen. He had outsailed them. De Veira decided that there was only one thing to do with his limited supply of provisions, and that was to steer for land. He set his course due west by his pocket compass, and calculated how he should divide the provisions. He had a tin can cover which would hold about a tablespoonful of water. This amount he allowed each man to drink twice a day, at 6 a. m. and 6 p. m. At the same time he gave each a finger length of hardtack. His bread gave out the day before the island of Dominica was sighted, and the water held out until they landed. The heat was so intense that all day long the men were obliged to throw the sea water over themselves to keep from being overcome.

Two Days of Rough Weather.
There was good weather until two days before Dominica was reached, when it became rough. It was necessary to keep two men bailing, to keep the boat free of water. It was a glad sight that greeted their eyes when on March 28 they saw Dominica. After landing and being fed, they were sent to Antigua, where George Sawyer, the United States consul, provided them with clothing and started them for home.

The first sinking of a ship by a whale, according to the captain of the vessel which was sunk, who is now living at Nantucket, occurred in the Pacific Ocean. It took eighty-seven days to reach the Sandwich Islands in an open boat. Before land was sighted cannibalism had been resorted to to preserve life. According to the story, the first lot to decide who should die fell on the captain, who was the only man in the boat who understood navigation, and it was necessary to cast a second ballot. The second lot fell upon the captain, also; so it was decided to take a negro member of the crew.

BUENCAMINO WANTS FILIPINO GOVERNOR

A little Filipino woman, traveling as a servant to the wife of an army officer, returned from uptown with her hands full of beautiful Hawaiian leis and cut flowers. She was the smallest of small women and was dressed in the regulation Filipino style. Large, airy sleeves of a delicate fabric, generously ornamented with pretty, white lace, partially covered her small brown arms and a skirt of a very gaudy hue fell not quite to her ankles, which peeped over flat-soled sandals, held on by the dexterous behavior of the toes. Much lace was apparently hidden under the skirt, for several edgings of the frail ornamentation were revealed whenever the breezes chose to dally with the hem of the outer garment. No hat bothered her head and her neck and shoulders were bare.

Lady passengers by the dozen went aboard with flowers in abundance, evidently meaning to take as much of Hawaii away with them as was possible. There are two other Filipino servants aboard besides the little girl with the leis. They are men. The Filipinos suffered very much with the cold a little while before the Buford arrived here. The transport managed to get into some cool weather and the poor little Filipinos were grey with cold, their teeth chattering. To be sure, they were not dressed for anything cooler than the Manila breezes.

An attempt was made this morning by several Honolulu young men to stow away in the transport. One or two did succeed in getting below and out of sight. Others were noticed and sent away about what business they might find ashore.

The Buford takes along with her to San Francisco a boy, a deck hand, who was left here by the transport Sheridan when she was here last.

The Territorial band, in charge of Captain Berger, and accompanied by two Hawaiian young ladies whose singing so delighted, spent several hours aboard the transport this morning, playing aft under the awning on the poop deck. The music of the band and the songs of the singers delighted all. The soldiers seemed to particularly enjoy the music, crowding aft on the main deck to hear all that went on. Famous Hawaiian airs, patriotic tunes and ragtime were served in the splendid style for which Berger and his boys are celebrated and the Buford's people voted the band one of the special joys of Honolulu.

There were numerous people aboard to see Fourth Officer Breed before the vessel sailed. His friends were anxious to congratulate him on his advance in the steamboat business since he left Honolulu.

Among those who want to see Breed was a former member of the crew of Wilder's setamer Maui, of which Breed was second mate at one time.

"We'll be back," said the sailor, as he took a look into Fourth Officer Breed's cabin; "We'll be back! Why, say, Breed, you've got a cabin that's as good as Admiral Beckley's aboard the flagship Kinau. Good luck to you, old man."

Breed is very popular aboard the Buford and is spoken of by her captain as a young man who is bound to make a rapid advance.

WARDE PLAYS OTHELLO

The next play of the Warde season will be Shakespeare's "Othello" tomorrow night. Mr. Warde will be seen in one of his strongest characters, the title role, which is claimed by many of his admirers to be one of his greatest characterizations. Mr. Herman plays Iago, Mr. Johnstone Cassio, Miss Ashton Desdemona and Miss Trescott Emilia. In response to popular request, Mr. Warde appears as "Macbeth" at a special performance, next Wednesday night. This will be one of the greatest of dramatic treats. The "Merchant of Venice" will be the matinee bill.

RECEIVED A JEWEL.

On Monday night last, at a meeting of Pacific Lodge, No. 822, F. & A. M., Past Master W. L. Stanley was presented with a past master's jewel. This should have been done at the time of the installation of the new officers but Judge Stanley was absent from the country at the time. The presentation speech was made by Past Master Norman E. Gedge and Judge Stanley responded in a happy strain. Refreshments were served after the presentation of the jewel.
